V.

V.

V, the twentieth letter in the Latin alphabet, answers to the sixth Hebrew letter ו, and being conformable to that in power, is both a vowel and consonant; but as to its figure, it was, A. C. 306, or thereabout, thus varied, V, v, u, u, according to Dr. Bernard, in his Literature of the learned world. In the Hebrew indeed, the vowel points determine its sound; for they being under it make it a consonant, as in וָוַלַּא וְוַלַּא וְוַלַּא vau, velo, visbab; but a vowel when over it, as in וּוּ; or in the middle, as in וּוּבֵנִי ubene. The Greeks admit only this latter use; as also our Saxon ancestors, who commonly substitute f in the place of v, as in fir, reoran, fiwa, seoven, as we find in very antient manuscripts; and sometimes u, as Leui Leui; which notwithstanding they sounded such words as we do now, otherwise no change of the figure had been made in after times. But though they gave this letter no place in their alphabet, they admitted it among their numerals; herein imitating the Greeks, who had made it a numeral only, calling it Βζυ ἐπίσημον. To begin with the consonant: As to the figure, it is by some thought to be made from the Greek Υ, by cutting off the shank; though the great Scaliger supposed this was rather made from that, by adding the stem: but it seems plain, the reason for this supposition, was his ascribing to the Farnesian monument an higher antiquity than he ought. As to his Proof from ΑΤΥΥΤΟC being found on a Greek coin, it is very weak; because all antiquaries know, that it was not unusual for the Greeks, after they came under the Roman power, to mix Latin letters among their own in coins and inscriptions, especially in Latin words. Marius Victorinus also is against him, and Ausonius expressly saith, Cecropius ignota viris serale sonans V. But though it be true that the Greeks had not the letter, yet it is plain that they, at least the Aeolians, had the Name, and gave it the same place as a numeral in their units, viz. 6, as it held in the mother alphabet, calling it Βζυ ἐπίσημον, as likewise Κόπια (90) in their tens, and Σεν πῖ (900) in their hundreds; being the only three Hebrew letters, ו, פ, י, which they had no occasion for in their alphabet. Nor had they the name only, but the form also from the Hebrew ו, turning it to the right, and bowing its body, so that its appearance was somewhat like the contracted mark ε, which therefore is now used for it. To proceed, from the name and figure, which are only accidents, to its power, which is the essence of a letter: As it is now pronounced, I think corruptly, it is a mute of the first rank, being of a middle sound between b and f, harder than the former, and softer than the latter, aspirating B, as Φ doth Π; and according to Priscian and Donatus, is no other than the Aeolian digamma. But if digamma be the Latin F, as they will have it, and a different power make a different letter, as surely it doth, F and V are two different sounds, and consequently different letters. This is plain from our own tongue, for we neither sound nor write knifes, or lives, though we do knife and life. I mean, as now pronounced; for it is very likely that before a vowel in the same syllable, both in the primitive and derivative tongues, it had the sound of our w in the same position, as in wall, wen, winc, worm, from val-lum, vena, vinum, vermis, Vid. Scal. Not. ad Euseb. & Lips. de L. L. pronunciatione. Yea, in Latin words, after g, q, and s, we give it the sound of w; as in lingua, sequor, suadeo, where v is melted indeed into the vowel following, but strengthens the sound. That it is not purely a vowel, its resolution into a vowel, frequently made by the poets, seems to evince; as in solvit, Catull. sylvae, Hor. This consonant precedes any vowel in the beginning, middle, or end of words. It is easily changed into its sister mutes, p, and b: for as from ovis opilio, dubius qu. durvius; so from verpus vervex, from γίβος gilvov. Thus much may suffice for the name, figure, and sound of the consonant, in the antient Latin. We proceed to the sound of the vowel, as now distinct from the consonant, both in figure and power. The inconvenience of expressing two different sounds by the same letter, was observed by Claudius Caesar, who endeavoured to remove it, by introducing the Aeolian digamma instead of it; which in public records obtained a while. But a very useful, though late, invention has applied an effectual remedy, by taking from the former the vocal, and from the latter the consonant power; so that now U is a vowel when it maketh a syllable alone, or cometh a before consonant in the same syllable: and as such hath a mutual intercourse with all the vowels. For as from κέλιξ calix, from μάδω mado; so from κάπαλλος capulus, from κραμπάλη crapula: as from ἰβυξ ibex, from ἐνυρὸς socer; so from νέφος nubes, from σκόπελος scopulus. As from φύω fio, from σέφω stipo; so from γλία gluten, from χάρις carus: as from ἀγκυρα anchora, from νῆξ nox; so from φῶρ fur, from ἀμουργὰ amurca. As solvit dissolved is solvit, sylva silua; so nervus from νεῦρον. Nor is it only related to the vowels, but to the diphthongs also. Thus fuscus from Φαῖδς, curro from καίρω, lagaena comes from λαγυνον, ἀ γλ sextarius. By this letter also sometimes the Greek u is expressed in Latin, as duplus from διπλῆς, Urania from Οὐρανία, u being equipollent in sound to that diphthong, as Maurus Terentianus, v. 150. or Terentianus Maurus, has observed, saying 'Ου literis nostris vacat, quod hunc V compleat satis sonum; which seems rather adapted to the vowel, than the consonant sound of this letter, according to the modern pronunciation. But if we admit, as was before hinted, that V in Latin was sounded as our W, the difference in sound is not so great. In gerunds and participles, this vowel was by the antients substituted for e; as, ad faciundum; mos gerundus est; as also in many adjectives of the superlative degree, this custom generally obtained till C. Caesar's time, when they first began to write by the middle vowel, optimus maximus, for optumius, maximus, as we learn from Fabius, l. 1, 7. Significant notes with the initial V. V. x Latin, Ξ ξ Greek. This letter, though, both in the alphabetical series and as a numeral, it answers to the Hebrew ס denoting sixty in that tongue, as this doth in Greek, yet undoubtedly in power comes nearer the harder sound of ψ, schin, which probably stood most antiently in this place, till it was usurped by the introduction of the secundary ס. Neither hath it only the power, but the form of ψ also; being made by erecting the plane or flat, and turning it to the right, to comply with the western way of writing. The Hebrews call it schin, i. e. a tooth, from its dental figure; and if you prostrate ξ thus ω, you will perfectly see the teeth of a saw. The name Ξ also, as well as the power and sound, is taken from schin, by removing the last consonant, analogically to what the Greeks did in adopting other letters, or rather by anastrophe, cs for sc. For as from mem and nun are made my, ny, so from schin is made xi. The Latin letter takes its power, and name indeed, from the Greek; but its form is the same with the capital Greek X Cbz, and is sometimes resolved into it, as in ἀκρόνυχος, qu. ἀκρὴ νύξ; and from future tenses in εω, and formed preter tenses in χα, as πλέω πέπλεχα, λέγω λέλεχα: and that into this; the Attics saying διξα and τριξα, for δίχα and τρίχα. It is a double consonant, compounded of the second order of the mutes, κ, γ, χ, and the formative σ; as in πλέω, πλέξω; λέγω, λέξω; ἔχω, ἔξω. The antient Attics long used the single letters, writing πλέσω, λέσω, ἔσω: and the antient Aeolians never used this conjunction, as neither did the Romans universally: for Nigidius Figulus, who, next to Varro, was in greatest reputation for his learning, refused to use it at all, as Victorinus acquainteth us. And Fabius, Inst. Or. I. 4. saith, they might have been without it. For all words might have been written as we find apecs, gregs. And Cicero telleth us, it was left out in many words, to give them an easier sound; as in ala, velum, &c. for axilla, venillum, &c. The later Athenians, on the other hand, used ξ instead of σ, especially in the beginning of words, as tempering the serpentine hiss of σ, which grated upon their ears, as I have shewn in my dissertation on that letter. And the Dorians also imitated them in the end of words; as in ὄρνιξ for ὄρνις, κλαῖξ for κλείς. This also they did in the futures, and first aorists of verbs baryton of the fourth conjugation; as in καθίξω, ἐκάθιξα, for καθίσω, ἐκάθισα, &c. On the other hand, the Latins sometimes substituted this letter for the Greek final σ, writing pistrix and Ajax for πίστις and Ἄϊας. This double letter in declining nouns, often loseth its s, as in fax, facis; rex, regis; crux, crucis. In numerals it expresseth ten, whence in old Roman manuscripts it is used for denarius, and as such seems to be made of V and A joined, i. e. twice five. X. Υ.

Υ,

υ, a Greek vowel, the figure whereof Palamedes is said to have taken from the flight of cranes, according to Philostratus; but surely this must be a mistake as to Palamedes, because we find it in the Sigean monument still in being, graven when the Greeks had only the sixteen letters which Cadmus brought into Greece. The two horns, as the old epigram calleth them, or branches, as Persius, were chosen by Pythagoras to demonstrate the easy descent to vice on the left, and the difficult ascent to virtue on the right; from whence it is called his letter. The ancient figure plainly shews, that the Latin V was taken from it, being exactly the same with it in figure. And perhaps V was antiently by the Latins substituted for it, as we may see in many words; as in cubus, duo, mus, sus, ruo, &c. from κύβητος, δύω, &c. and this they did antiently in words that were afterwards writ by the υ, as in Musia, Suria, for Mysia, Syria: but the instances in these words are fewer. It is certain the Latin V had in many words a deeper sound than the Greek V, and therefore not the same letter, but nearer to their ω, forasmuch as Βούρ, Ίδω, were writ by the Greeks for Brutus Junius: yea the antient Latins writ ou for u long, as in loumen, joure, for lumen, jure. The Latins have no capital of this letter, because they do not want it: for the Greeks asperate all words beginning with υ; but the Romans owning an asperation for a letter, as indeed it is, and always was with them, prefix h before such words as they take, or borrow from them, and therefore are all marshalled under it. But the smaller y they have from the Greek Υ, by obliquating its stem, and use it in the middle and end of words, as in Cayster, corymbus; or end, as onyx, martyr. Our mother tongue, in the beginning of words and syllables, admits it as a consonant, as in yarn, yest, yoke, unyoked, but otherwise as a vowel.

Z.

Z, ζ Greek; Ζ z when borrowed by the Latins to express Greek words; ז Hebrew. This letter is called a double consonant, whereof the Greeks have three, Ζ, Ψ, and Ζ: the two former were of later invention, but this stood in the ancient alphabet, as appears by the citation of Pliny, Lib. VII, c. 56, out of Aristotle, notwithstanding the corrupt reading even in the best edition of Pliny, where Ζ is put for Z, and Z for Ζ, as the learned Salmasius observed, and after him the great Spanhemius. This mistake seems purely to have been occasioned by the Roman librarians, who mistook the one for the other. The ancient figure of this letter was , and by obliquating the perpendicular hath its present form. Its sound, now unknown, was between the Phenician zain and the Latin G; which, though late, took its original from thence. Hence G is sometimes changed into it, as in ὀλιζων, which the Ionians used for ὀλιγών; and φύζω for φύγων. So the Dorians writ ζευω for σεύω. The Latins also used indifferently zingiber or gingiber, for the Arabian word writ by the Greeks ζιγγίβερι. That this letter had a very sweet sound, is certain from the authority of Dion. Halicarnassius, Περὶ συνθέσεως ὀνομάτων. And Fabius supposed that the Romans could never arrive at the sweetness of the Greek elocution, because it wanted y and z, which he calls the sweetest of all their letters, Inst. Or. XII. c. 10. For which reason, one would think it could not have the sound of a double consonant. For if it were pronounced as the Aeolians and Dorians writ δα, or αδ, as in δουγός for ζυγός, δσέυς or αδέυς for ζεύς, τράπεδα for τράπεζα, &c. it must be very hard, especially when a consonant followed, as ζμερόνδς, similaces. Its Hebrew mother ז, is certainly a single consonant, as also in our English tongue, where we sometimes join two of them together, as muzzle, puzzle, &c. The Latins likewise often put d for g or this letter, as in nidor, from νιζα; karpago, from ἀρπάζω. The Greeks change it also into σ, as in the first future tense of the fourth conjugation; or rather exclude it before the formative σ, as in σώζω, σώσω. The Latins indeed often put js for it, as in patrisso, pitisso, from πατρίζω, πιτίζω: and sometimes also substitute j, as being near in sound to g, as in jugum, from ζυγός. In Greek numerals it noteth VII, though it be only the sixth letter, because ς is interposed in the numerical alphabet.

* Zythum, i. n. & zythus, i. m. [ἀ ζῆω] Beer, or ale; drink made of corn. A drink used by the old Gauls, so called from the seething or boiling of it; whence also cyder seemeth to have had its name: others ascribe it to the Egyptians; it may be used for ale, or beer, since Suidas saith it was ἀπὸ κριθῶν γινόμενος, made of barley, Plin. 22, 82. conf. Col. 10, 116.
